Media violence and youth violence: correlational and longitudinal relationships between media and school-age youth violence. Using correlational, causal, and longitudinal research designs, this research examined relationships among several types of school-age violence (i.e., physical, verbal, and cyber), exposure to violent media, and attitudes regarding media violence. Consistent with past research, younger children were more likely to commit acts of violence and were more likely to feel negative attitudes regarding media violence. Violent media exposure did not predict violence directly; however, media violence exposure predicted attitudes supporting violence against women. Media violence exposure also predicted attitudes supporting violent resistance. Contrary to past research, violent media exposure did not predict subsequent violent offending. However, cross-lagged model analyses suggested that attitudes favoring violence against women predicted later exposure to violent media and that violent media exposure predicted later attitudes favoring violent resistance. As exposure to violent media increased, attitudes favoring violent resistance also became more prevalent. Implications for research and for school-based programs to reduce violence are discussed.
